Gorongosa National Park is at the southern end of the Great African Rift valley in the heart of central Mozambique. It comprises 1,2 million hectares of open plan, bush, swamp and waterways, spread between the Pungwe and Urema rivers. During the 1960s this was one of the finest game reserves in Southern Africa and attracted more than 12000 visitors a year and had more game than the Kruger National Park.

The famous camp at casa dos leões, or the “house of lions” was so named because a pride of lions inhabited the old buildings and could frequently be seen clambering over the framework and broken walls. Sadly they like the vast herds of buffalo, eland, kudu wildebeest and sable, are now gone. During the war much of the game was shot for food, and the rest camp at Chitengo was used as a base and subsequently bombed to bits.

Recently the Mozambican government has started restoring the park, erecting a small campsite at Chitengo and clearing mines from the roads. The park can now be explored in private vehicles or organized game drives. The vegetation and birdlife is still superb and there are plans to introduce game in the near future from South Africa and Zimbabwe, but it will take decades before restoration is completed.
